

Chapter Review Report

Similarity index
0%

Comments for Authors

Dear Author, Thank you for the revised version of the chapter. Your manuscript has improved substantially, and several of the main concerns raised in the previous review have been very well addressed. In particular, I think the conceptual architecture is now considerably clearer, since the revised synthesis of Goffman, Foucault, and Zuboff explains more explicitly what each theoretical perspective contributes, how the three proposed constructs relate to one another, and what becomes analytically visible through their combination. The addition of the conceptual figure is also helpful in clarifying the progression from the corporate stage to hybrid visibility and the paradox of spectatorship. The relationship between the present chapter and the author’s earlier use of the concept “paradox of spectatorship” has also been addressed very well. The revised manuscript now acknowledges the earlier publication and explains clearly that the present conceptualisation represents a transfer and reformulation of the concept in a different domain and through a different mechanism. The revised manuscript also engages more with contemporary research on electronic performance monitoring, algorithmic management, platform work, and related forms of digitally mediated control. The illustrative cases are now better supported, particularly the discussion of gig-platform work and call-centre monitoring, and the Discussion section develops the organisational implications of opacity more carefully and distinguishes appropriately between existing evidence and the proposed design implications. Before publication, I would recommend a small number of additional revisions (this time, minor revisions).

1. Strengthen the balance with contemporary workplace and organisational research. While the manuscript now includes more relevant literature on electronic performance monitoring and algorithmic management, which is a significant improvement, the historical and interdisciplinary material still occupies a comparatively prominent place relative to contemporary research on employee experiences and organisational consequences. I therefore encourage you to strengthen the discussion selectively with recent workplace and organisational research on themes such as autonomy, privacy, wellbeing, employee responses to monitoring, and related organisational outcomes. This does not require a substantial expansion of the literature review, but rather a somewhat stronger anchoring of the theoretical argument in the contemporary workplace scholarship most directly related to the chapter’s contribution.

2. Please consider further tightening some of the historical and cultural illustrations. I think the interdisciplinary character of the chapter remains one of its distinctive features and should certainly be preserved. However, some historical examples remain relatively extensive in comparison with the contemporary workplace literature, which is why I encourage you to review these passages once more and retain the examples that most directly clarify the conceptual argument, while shortening material whose role is primarily analogical. This would further improve the balance and focus of the chapter as a contribution to the study of the contemporary workplace.

3. Conduct a final check of empirical claims and supporting references. The revised version provides substantially better evidentiary support for the illustrative cases. Nevertheless, a few broader statements concerning contemporary employee practices and experiences still appear without direct citation. For example, statements describing how workers adapt home environments under hybrid monitoring would benefit either from appropriate empirical support or from more cautious framing as conceptual illustrations. I therefore recommend a final check throughout the manuscript to ensure that empirical descriptions of workplace practices and employee experiences are either supported by relevant sources or clearly distinguished from theoretical interpretation. The revised version of your manuscript is much stronger and now presents a clearer and more defensible conceptual contribution. The remaining issues are relatively limited and concern primarily the balance between interdisciplinary material and contemporary workplace scholarship, together with a final refinement of evidentiary support. Good luck with your work.

Overall Decision for this Chapter
Minor revision (second review required)

Download this Chapter Review Report

Back

Continue

You are contributing to the book project:
The Evolving Landscape of Workplace - Challenges and Opportunities [Working Title]

PART OF THE BOOK SERIES
Social Sciences

Edited By
Cătălina Radu
Bucharest University of Economic Studies
Mirona Radu
National University of Theatre and Film I.L. Caragiale

To be assigned:
DOI 10.5772/intechopen.1014436
ISBN 978-1-80632-789-8
Print ISBN 978-1-80632-790-4
eBook (PDF) ISBN 978-1-80632-791-1

ISSN 2977-6473

About the Book

Document History

Your personal contact

Tea Jelaca
Publishing Process Manager

Contact

