I. Research

My scholarship sits at the intersection of environmental justice and climate governance. The through-line of my work is a deceptively simple question: as the United States and other jurisdictions race to decarbonize and adapt to a warming climate, how do legal institutions distribute the risks and the benefits of that transition—and how can doctrine be rebuilt so that the communities historically burdened by pollution are not burdened anew? This agenda maps directly onto environmental law's "environmental justice" frontier and onto Berkeley Law's public mission of expanding access, affordability, and impact for students and communities from all backgrounds.

Accomplishments. I have authored [X] peer-reviewed articles. My core contributions include:

- [Title of Article 1], [Journal] ([Year]). This article argues [core claim—e.g., that existing siting law systematically externalizes health costs onto low-income communities] and has been cited in [court/agency/advocacy context].

- [Title of Article 2], [Journal] ([Year]). Here I examine [specific gap—e.g., the enforcement deficit in biodiversity law] using [method—doctrinal/empirical/comparative].
- A work-in-progress, [Title of Article 3], received [recognition—e.g., a junior scholar award / invited symposium].

Beyond publication, my work has been presented at [conferences/ institutions] and has fed [policy conversations / clinic practice].

Future agenda. Over the next three to five years I plan to pursue two strands. First, [Project 1]: using [method] to study [problem], with the expected contribution of [theoretical or policy output]. Second, [Project 2]: extending the environmental-justice frame to [emerging issue, e.g., the local distribution of climate-adaptation finance], where the literature currently has [gap]. Berkeley's interdisciplinary ecosystem—including [relevant center or program, e.g., the Center for Law, Energy & the Environment]—would materially accelerate this work.

Crucially, I see scholarship as inseparable from field-building. I am committed to a more equitable and diverse environmental-law academy, and I pursue that through [mentoring PhD/JD students from underrepresented backgrounds / organizing inclusive workshops / open-access dissemination].

II. Teaching

I believe legal education should let students of every discipline, educational path, and lived experience enter and then wield legal tools. Two commitments anchor my teaching: problem-driven inquiry and context-empowered learning.

Courses. I have taught [Course A, e.g., Environmental Law] and [Course B, e.g., Climate Law], and designed [new module / clinic component] at [institution]. At Berkeley I would be glad to teach: - [Environmental / climate law course(s)], aimed at [audience—JD, LL.M., or cross-listed]; and - at least one 1L required course (e.g., [Constitutional Law / Torts / Legislation & Regulation], depending on my training), to support the school's first-year needs.

Inclusive practice. In course design I use [case studies / group projects / community interviews] to lower the participation threshold for non-traditional students; in the classroom I establish explicit norms of [respect for difference / inviting plural perspectives]. For example, in [a course], I [concrete move—e.g., brought in a community organizer as a guest speaker], connecting black-letter doctrine to real conditions and giving students from varied backgrounds a point of entry.

Mentorship is central to my teaching. Over [N years] I have advised [number/type of students], several from [diverse backgrounds], who went on to [outcomes—clerkships/placement/public-interest roles].

III. Service

My public service has consistently centered the practice and justice dimensions of environmental law.

Field-related public service. I have [specific activity—e.g., advised community groups on environmental compliance / submitted expert commentary in a permitting proceeding / written public-facing policy briefs], directly serving [affected communities / the policymaking process]. I also serve on [journal / association] as [role], working to widen open and diverse participation in the field.

Academic and professional service. I review for [Journal] and contribute to [conference / appointment committee], including [diversity initiative] within [academic organization].

Alignment with the public mission. A common thread in this service is removing barriers and supporting participation by individuals from all backgrounds—whether by [lowering publication thresholds], [creating platforms for early-career scholars], or [routing academic resources to under-resourced communities]. That aim dovetails exactly with Berkeley Law's public mission of access, affordability, and empowering students from all backgrounds to pursue impactful careers.
