Name: [Your Name]

I. Research

My scholarship examines how law constructs and constrains identity-based inequality, with a focus on [chosen domain—e.g., voting rights / policing and prisons / free speech and expression]. The question that drives my work is deceptively concrete: when the state allocates political voice, liberty, and protection unevenly along lines of race, gender, sexuality, religion, or disability, what doctrinal and institutional reforms actually close—rather than merely narrate—those gaps? This agenda sits squarely within civil-rights scholarship and answers Berkeley Law's public mission of expanding access and impact for students and communities from all backgrounds.

Accomplishments. I have authored [X] peer-reviewed articles. My core contributions include:

- [Title of Article 1], [Journal] ([Year]). This article argues [core claim—e.g., that recent voting-restriction doctrine quietly re-entrenches racial disparity] and has been cited in [court/advocacy/commentary context].
- [Title of Article 2], [Journal] ([Year]). Here I examine [specific gap—e.g., the carceral consequences of discretionary policing] using [method—doctrinal/empirical/comparative].
- A work-in-progress, [Title of Article 3], received [recognition—e.g., a junior scholar award / invited symposium].

Beyond publication, my work has been presented at [conferences/ institutions] and has informed [policy or movement conversations].

Future agenda. Over the next three to five years I plan to pursue two strands. First, [Project 1]: using [method] to study [problem—e.g., the speech-equality tension on regulated platforms], with the expected contribution of [theoretical or policy output]. Second, [Project 2]: extending civil-rights analysis to [emerging issue—e.g., algorithmic discrimination], where doctrine currently lags. Berkeley's interdisciplinary ecosystem—including [relevant center or program, e.g., the Death Penalty Clinic / Berkeley Center for Comparative Equality & Anti-Discrimination Law]—would materially accelerate this work, and I would be honored to advance the legacy of Judge Thelton Henderson's life-long commitment to equal justice.

Crucially, I see scholarship as field-building. I am committed to a more equitable and diverse civil-rights academy, and I pursue that through [mentoring students from underrepresented backgrounds / organizing inclusive workshops / open-access dissemination].

II. Teaching

I believe legal education should let students of every discipline, educational path, and lived experience enter and then wield legal tools. Two commitments anchor my teaching: problem-driven inquiry and context-empowered learning.

Courses. I have taught [Course A, e.g., Constitutional Law] and [Course B, e.g., Civil Rights Litigation], and designed [new module / clinic component] at [institution]. At Berkeley I would be glad to teach: - [Civil-rights / constitutional law course(s)], aimed at [audience—JD, LL.M., or cross-listed]; and - at least one 1L required course (e.g., [Constitutional Law / Torts / Civil Procedure], depending on my training), to support the school's first-year needs.

Inclusive practice. In course design I use [case studies / role simulations / community interviews] to lower the participation threshold for non-traditional students; in the classroom I establish explicit norms of [respect for difference / inviting plural perspectives]. For example, in [a course], I [concrete move—e.g., brought in formerly incarcerated advocates as guest speakers], connecting black-letter doctrine to real conditions and giving students from varied backgrounds a point of entry.

Mentorship is central to my teaching. Over [N years] I have advised [number/type of students], several from [diverse backgrounds], who went on to [outcomes—clerkships/impact-litigation roles/public-interest careers].

III. Service

My public service has consistently centered the practice and justice dimensions of civil-rights law.

Field-related public service. I have [specific activity—e.g., represented clients in civil-rights matters through a clinic / submitted amicus briefs / advised voting-rights organizations], directly serving [marginalized communities / the policymaking process]. I also serve on [journal / association] as [role], working to widen open and diverse participation in the field.

Academic and professional service. I review for [Journal] and contribute to [conference / appointment committee], including [diversity initiative] within [academic organization].

Alignment with the public mission. A common thread in this service is removing barriers and supporting participation by individuals from all backgrounds—whether by [lowering publication thresholds], [creating platforms for early-career scholars], or [routing legal resources to under-resourced communities]. That aim dovetails exactly with Berkeley Law's public mission and with the Civil Rights Endowment's dedication to equal justice under law.
